desuz for the amnorment of his guests, and disguish himself as a gipney, determines to ascertain the state of Jane Eyre's feelings towards himself, which he accomplishes in a very melodrama-iomanner, while telling her fortune. He then discovers himself, informs her that a mystery surrounds him, but finally seks her to be his wife, to which also consents. He then resorts to the ocusion strategem of losing his property to get rid of offering to marry her if she will take him for himself alone, an idea at which the Lady Bianche is very propery horrified. And the whole family, in a torrent dignation, repair to Mr. Roches'er's private apartment to express their sentiments and take a dignified leave. After gying through this per trimance, they are more aborded than ever at fluiding out that it was only a stratagem to flac out what the young lady wanted to marry, and are formally introduced to Jaco Eyre as the future mistress of Thornfold. At the same time the chaptain outers and servants with the Bible and a prayer book; they are transfixed with rage and as onli hment; when hor this she falls are beard, contains are thrown aske and Rochester's maniso wife ng and eyes glaring, while Stace Pool, from whose custody she has ensaped, is vainly endeavoring to secure her. Of source the ceremony is stopped; the mystery to cleared up; Jane Eyre falls sansaless on the ground. In the last set all ends happily for the lover—the munice wife is burned in the old house, which she had set on fine herself, and her husband, though deprived of his sight by the flames, gets a good wife as a compensation.

"Jane Eyre" was the most powerful noval ever written by a woman, and though it abounds in situations that are expable of intense dramatic effects, yet it is definent are expanse of needs or annexe energy, yet it students in the delineation of original character—a fatal defect in all femisine productions. The heroine is the only character that is at all natural; for Rootester is an emergeration, and the rest of the dramatic persome are only folls to bring out the peculiarities es the principal figures on the canvas. But not-withstanding this defect in the novel, Mr. Brougham has constructed a drama out of it that is intensely interesting and exciting, and will no doubt have a great raccess. The first two acts are tame enough; but in the third act, where Rochester, disguised as a gipsey, tempts and tertures his governess into a confession of her love les him, and makes her confers her woman's weakness in spite of hersel', the play of passion was superb, and the two artists were vehemently cheered, and called be fore the curtain at the case of the act. The interest is wall sustained to the end of the piece, and leaves a very Estact ry impression on the audience. Miss Keene, who seems to have fully recovered from her recent fillness, gave a most truthful and impressive have read the book will bear witness to its accuracy. The quiet, undemonstrative governors may not seem to be a tage character, but the reality and earnestness Miss Keepe threw into the part made it most effective. The Roobester of the novel was not as good looking nor as young as Mr. Jordan made him, but the part was played with great force. The other actors did not have much to do, and they did that. The monwing of the piece wa good, and the scenery, as a general thing, creditable. At the conclusion of the play the author was loadly called for, but circ not appear. Mr. dail, the stage manager, aancunced a repedition of the piece until further notice.

THE PYNE AND HARRISON PROUPE -A more fashionable er enthusiastic audience never was assembled within the wells of Niblo's concert room, than that which welsomal the Pyne and Harrison troupe last evening, on their first appearance is this city since their recent tour in the South. Leng before the time appounded for the sommencement of the performances the room was filled, and several hundred ladies and gentlemen were obliged either to take a standing place in some of the aieles, o return to their homes. The programme, as announced afferded some of the best gems from the popular English and Italian operas, also a few choice ballads, duets and giess. Miss Louisa Pyne was in excellent song, and on several occasions was encored. The cavation of "Perch nen ho," from the opera of "Lucia," was particularly well rendered. "Home, Sweet Home," and the "Skyhark Song," were also sung in the most delicious manne by this fair cantatrice. Miss Susan Pyne, Mr. Harrison Mr. Horncaste and Mr. Stretton were well received, par ticularly in a giee sing entitled "Spring's Delights." The second and lest concert of this troupe, previous to their departure for Canada, will come off on Weinesday (to morrow) evening.

An evidence of its supremacy is found in the fact that though introduced by Brady a few months since, for the first time in this city, it has already, in a great measure, superseded its predecesor, the daguerreotype. The extensive demand arising from its b troduction has rendered the most extensive manipulative arrangements necessary. It is from this, and the possakt of facilities attainable by no other arisis in the United States, that Strady is enabled to offer superior pictures at a reduced grice.
